All About 304 Stainless Steel

Stainless steels get their names from the American Iron & Steel Institute (AISI) and the Society of Automotive Engineers (SAE), who have separately created their own naming systems for steel alloys based on alloying elements, uses and other factors. Steel names can get confusing, as the same alloy can have different identifiers depending on which system is used; however, understand that the chemical composition of most alloy blends remains the same across classification systems. In the case of stainless steels, they are often composed of 10 to 30% chromium and are made to withstand varying degrees of corrosion exposure. To learn more about the differences among stainless steels, feel free to read our article on the type of stainless steel.

Type 304 steel is part of the 3xx stainless steels or those alloys which are blended with chromium and nickel. Below is a chemical breakdown of 304 steel:

- $\leq 0.08\%$ carbon
- 18-20% chromium
- 66.345-74% iron
- $\leq 2\%$ manganese
- 8-10.5% nickel
- $\leq 0.045\%$ phosphorus
- $\leq 0.03\%$ sulfur
- $\leq 1\%$ silicon

Type 304 steel is austenitic, which is simply a type of molecular structure made from the iron-chromium-nickel alloy blend. It makes 304 steel essentially non-magnetic, and gives it a lower weakness to corrosion between grains thanks to austenitic steels being generally low carbon. 304 steel welds well using most welding methods, both with and without fillers, and it easily draws, forms and spins into shape.

Corrosion resistance & temperature effects

Type 304 steel, being the most popular stainless steel, is naturally chosen for its corrosion resistance. It can resist rusting in many different environments, only being majorly attacked by chlorides. It also experiences increased pitting in warm temperatures (above 60 degrees Celsius), though the higher carbon grades (304H) mitigate this effect considerably. This means that 304 steel mainly rusts not in high temperatures, but in aqueous solutions where continuous contact with corrosive materials can wear down the alloy. 304 steels are not readily hardened by thermal treatment, but can be annealed to increase workability and cold worked to increase strength. If corrosion resistance is of high priority to a project, 304L is the best choice as its decreased carbon content reduces intergranular corrosion.

What is Brass ?

Brass is an alloy made primarily of copper and zinc. The proportions of the copper and zinc are varied to yield many different kinds of brass. Basic modern brass is 67% copper and 33% zinc. However, the amount of copper may range from 55% to 95% by weight, with the amount of zinc varying from 5% to 45%.

Lead is commonly added to brass at a concentration of around 2%. The lead addition improves the machinability of brass. However, significant lead leaching often occurs, even in brass that contains a relatively low overall concentration of lead.

Uses of brass include musical instruments, firearm cartridge casing, radiators, architectural trim, pipes and tubing, screws and decorative items.

Brass Properties

- Brass often has a bright gold appearance, however, it can also be reddish-gold or silvery-white. A higher percentage of copper yields a rosy tone, while more zinc makes the alloy appear silver.
- Brass has higher malleability than either bronze or zinc.
- Brass has desirable acoustic properties appropriate for use in musical instruments.
- The metal exhibits low friction.
- Brass is a soft metal that may be used in cases when a low chance of sparking is necessary.
- The alloy has a relatively low melting point.
- It's a good conductor of heat.
- Brass resists corrosion, including galvanic corrosion from saltwater.
- Brass is easy to cast.
- Brass is not ferromagnetic. Among other things, this makes it easier to separate from other metals for recycling.

Yellow Brasses

C26000, 70/30 Brass and C26130, Arsenical brass, have excellent ductility and strength and are the most widely used brasses. Arsenical brass contains a small addition of arsenic, which greatly improves corrosion resistance in waters, but is otherwise effectively identical. These alloys have the distinctive bright yellow color normally associated with brass. They have the optimum combination of strength and ductility in the Cu-Zn alloys, coupled with good corrosion resistance. C26000 is used for architecture, drawn and spun containers and shapes, electrical terminals and connectors, door handles, plumbers hardware. C26130 is used for tube and fittings in contact with water, including potable water.

ARTIZE

A unique and innovative design that captivates the eye.
Its distinctive twist elements add a touch of artistic flair.

The background of the page is a dark, almost black, space filled with a complex, abstract pattern of wavy, overlapping lines. These lines, in various shades of grey and white, create a sense of movement and depth, resembling a liquid or fabric that has been twisted and draped. The pattern is most prominent on the right side of the page, where it forms a large, organic shape that flows downwards and then back up towards the right edge. The overall effect is one of dynamic, organic complexity.
